Looking Around the Corner—Implications for Dental Educators

As change continues at a fast pace in the United States, it becomes even more imperative for dental educators to anticipate it. Using survey and demographic data collected and analyzed by ADEA, Dr. Valachovic, ADEA President and CEO, will lead you “around the corner” by presenting key findings from the current state of dental education. As members and leaders of ADEA, Dr. Valachovic’s remarks will provide you with valuable information to better understand trends in dental education and a framework to use during the discussions of Councils and Sections at the 2014 ADEA Fall Meetings.

Learning Objectives

- Describe key trends in dental education.
- Delineate how demographic trends are impacting applicant pools.
- Recognize the implications of change in dental education for their dental schools.

Building Faculty Legacy through Collaborative Engagement of Current Dental Students

In recent years, dental education has endured challenges that have impacted the number of full-time faculty positions, such as reduction in financial support from states, curricular changes, the expansion of new models of dental education and rising student financial burdens that influence graduate employment choices. Currently there is a need for more full-time faculty in the clinical sciences area within dental schools. Dental schools have an opportunity to be proactive in growing the next generation of dental educators by developing relationships with current students to increase their interest in dental education careers.

ADEA student chapters provide an opportunity for students to be involved in this endeavor. One objective for student chapters is to plan activities to increase interest in academic dental careers. This could be accomplished through the use of teaching assistants or student tutors, or to generate a robust pipeline through the ADEAGies Foundation/AADR Academic Dental Careers Fellowship Program (ADCFP). The ADCFP is designed to create a discussion between faculty and students on how to increase student interest in academic dental careers. The program examines best practices for attracting dental students to academic careers along with the barriers for young dentists to become educators. This presentation will also reveal the great benefits of becoming an academic dentist and explore programs currently in place at ADEA and member institutions.

Learning Objectives

- Identify dental students' perceptions of academic dental careers.
- Describe the benefits of academic dental careers.
- Outline the benefits of participating in the ADCFP.
- Recognize the benefits of working with ADEA student chapters at their universities.
- Facilitate a discussion with faculty and students to construct potential solutions to increase interest in dental education careers.
