Presenter

Todd Ester, D.D.S., M.A.

Clinical Assistant Professor and Assistant Dean, Diversity, Equity and Inclusion

University of Michigan School of Dentistry

As the students, staff and faculty in dental schools across the United States become more diverse in race/ethnicity, gender identity, sexual orientation, religion, generations and abilities, it is critical to discuss the opportunities and challenges of working with people who may be different from us. Beyond this, we must engage in meaningful dialogue of what diversity means and the importance of creating an inclusive environment where people from backgrounds under-represented in dentistry can thrive. We will explore how conscious and unconscious biases can lead us to be party to microaggressions. We will also talk about the bystander effect, stereotype threat and how they impact the learning and working environments.

Learning Objectives

- Define diversity, equity and inclusion.
- Explain how microaggressions, rooted in conscious and unconscious biases, impact the environment and performance of students, staff and faculty.
- Discuss the importance of intervening when witnessing discrimination in the learning or working environments.

With dental education facing a faculty and leadership shortage, we must recruit and retain the expertise of faculty of both genders. We graduate men and women in near equal proportion, yet the number of women in dental education lags behind men, particularly in the leadership ranks. What can you do to help? As a woman, how do you speak up without appearing pushy? As a man, should you always wonder if your words and actions are perceived as microaggressions toward women? In this session, led by men and women faculty members, you will be equipped with strategies to promote the pathway of women leaders.

Learning Objectives

- Explain how we all benefit from gender equity.
- Describe external and self-imposed barriers women encounter.
- Advocate effectively for women, whether you are a man or woman.
